The history of facial hair is as long and varied as man himself. In prehistoric times, men grew facial hair mostly for practical reasons: to protect the face from harsh weather and make themselves impressive during battle. Beards became associated with wealth and power, and different people, like Vikings, knights, princes, and army officers, sported wonderful and sometimes elaborate facial hair as a mark of either bravery or high birth. However, mustaches fell out of fashion in the 60s. Rebellious youths in that decade preferred full beards to mustaches. Mustaches came back into style in the 70s as a symbol of power. As is known, facial hair used to be popular in the military, but it has now been banned from most modern armies. It is thought to prevent hygiene and the correct fit of gas masks. Some people grow beards at certain times of the year. The Movember movement encourages men to grow mustaches in November to make people aware of the dangers of male cancers.
